Re: [Circdebate] Question for Jake

Thanks for the reply Jake. That's an interesting and reasonable analogy. I think right about some men and women, but I also think that some men and women v reasonably well do end up with issues that result from their having been cut as c they realize that it's not a universal practice in the world, or even in a given soci believe that both male and female genital cutting, in all it's various and diverse l and social infant male circ) should be a decision left to the individual whose gen they are old enough to make the decision for themselves. It seems only fair, no? Opinions and dialogue from anyone are welcome (I'm a recent member on this l covering ground already trodden). Thanks, and best to all,

Note: forwarded message attached.

Jake,

Like you, I believe that parents who choose circumcise believe that it will harm their children.

But what about the men who experience mental trauma circumcised as children? Did it not end up harming psychologically?

Your inability to understand comes from your put aside your own views. I do not share your belief that harms children, and I am sure that neither do parents who circumcise. Let me rephrase your statement, then, from a non-viewpoint:

"Defending people who do what they have decided interests of their children, as you do, is

For your information, I have no shortage of and ethics.

The fact that I have arrived at these by thought, rather than having been handed them shrink-wrapped does not mean that they do not exist.
